The diverse network of Title X-funded health centers provides a range of essential preventive services, from cancer screenings to HIV testing to contraceptive care, for millions of low-income people every year.

Despite this important mission, federal funding for Title X has shrunk in recent years, and now fewer people are able to access family planning and sexual health services funded by Title X. In 2014, only 39% of women who needed publicly funded contraceptive services were able to access them.

This factsheet was originally published in November 2017 and updated in September 2018 to reflect the latest Family Planning Annual Report data. Please note that 12 new grantees were awarded funds on September 1, 2018, and that this map may not reflect the current state service delivery network.
